THE TEMPLE OF DERR

BY AYLWARD M. BLACKMAN M. A.

Laycock Student of Egyptology at Worcester College, Oxford
Late Oxford University Nubian Research Scholar
Formerly Scholar of Queen’s College.
PREFACE.

This record of the Temple of Derr was made during the months of January, February, and March 1910. The difficulty of obtaining satisfactory photographs of the reliefs in the inner rooms (see pp. 25, 49 and 74) was great. Those published are the fruits of considerable labour — I was single handed — and of an experience gained after many failures. Early in the season I met with an accident in which a leg was badly injured. By this untoward event, I was effectually prevented from climbing the rocks to search for graffiti, a most regrettable omission in view of the fine collection of rock-inscriptions made by Dr Röder (1) in the district where he worked for this same series of memoirs.

My best thanks are due to Miss B. Porter (2), who once more furnished me with all the bibliographical particulars, and to Professor Breasted, who kindly read over the proof-sheets, and collated my copies of the inscriptions with his own. To him I am indebted for many useful suggestions, while his critical and experienced eye detected more than one error in my versions of the hieroglyphic texts. These friendly offices will have greatly enhanced any value that this publication may possess.

Aylward M. Blackman.

Derr, called ed-Dirr by the inhabitants, is situated on the east bank of the river about 190 miles south of Shellâl. It is by far the largest township in Lower Nubia and, before the conquest of that country by Mohammed Aly, was a place of importance, being the seat of the Kâshif, or native ruler, who held sway over the territory that lies between Shellâl and Halfa. The Kâshif's palace, a large building of crude brick, is still standing, and, though somewhat ruinous in parts, is even now occupied by his descendants. This palace and the mosque adjoining it are well worth visiting. In the latter are some old Arabic inscriptions engraved on slabs of alabaster inserted in the walls. Derr is still the administrative centre of Lower Nubia, and its white government offices standing on the river bank, with the minaret of the Kâshif's mosque rising above them — all set in the midst of extensive palm-groves. — never fail to attract the eye of the passing traveller as he speeds Halfa-wards on the express steamer.

Just above Derr, the Nile makes an immense bend (1) and flows almost due south till it reaches Korosko (2). In the description of the temple this fact, for the sake of convenience, has been ignored and the walls referred to as though the axis of the temple lay east and west. This is only following the example of the Egyptians themselves, who always assumed the river to run north, and orientated their temples and tombs accordingly.

All that now remains of the temple of Derr, which lies some way back from the river behind the town, consists of two pillared halls, a sanctuary, and two side-chapels (see Pl. I). These, with the exception of parts of the first hall, are entirely excavated in the rather low cliff that marks the commencement of the high desert.

(1) This must be the eastern bend, alluded to in an inscription in Pennâ's tomb at Anibeh. I., D., III., 299, c.c. Perhaps also (S Berm. Urkunden, W, 8) is a name for this part of the river.

(2) S. S. E.
There may originally have been an open court and pylon in front of these chambers, but no trace whatever now remains of any such constructions. Though all the walls and pillars of the first hall were probably rock-hewn, masonry seems to have been used for the roofing as far as the third row of pillars (see the remarks on p. 4), in the architraves of which grooves have been cut to receive the ends of the stone beams (see Pl. II). This is the only surviving trace of masonry.

The temple is entirely the work of Ramses II who named it "House-of-Meriamon-Ramesses-in-the-House-of-Re" or "Temple-of-Meriamon-Ramesses-in-the-House-of-Re" (1), and dedicated it to Re the sun-god (2). But as was the case at Soleh (3) and Serreh (4) the statue of the royal founder was also worshipped here, and this cult figure largely in the scenes sculptured on the walls (5).

We know nothing of the temple’s subsequent history, and there is no mention of it in any inscription, except that in the tomb of Pennê at Anibeh (6) "Ramses-Meriamon-in-the-House-of-Re, the town over against the House-of-Re", is said to form the northern boundary of certain lands with which a statue of Ramses VI, that had been set up by Pennê in the temple at Anibeh (Miam (7)), was endowed.

1. See p. 113.
2. Second pillared hall: north aisle; architraves of pillars: north face. Also called Amon-Re and Re-Harkhife, i.e. second pillared hall: north aisle; architraves of pillars: south face, and south aisle: architraves of pillars: north face.
3. Breasted, Records, II, § 893; L., D., Ill, 84, c; id., 85, a.
4. Breasted, op. cit., III, § 502. There were probably also similar cultus-statues of Ramses at Abu Simbel (see L., D., Ill, 188, a, 189, c, and 191, h and k), Gerf Husain (see Weigall, Antiquities of Lower Nubia, p. 82; L., D., Ill, 178, c), and Wady es-Sabû (see Breasted, op. cit., III, § 502; L., D., Ill, 182, c). Cf. also the statue of Ramses VI in Anibeh temple referred to below.
5. i.e. in the sanctuary: north wall: scene I; northern side-chapel: south wall: scene III; southern side-chapel: east wall: scenes I and II; first pillared hall: east wall: scene IV; second pillared hall: north wall: scene I, and south wall: scene II. These two last mentioned scenes represent a boat-shrine being carried on the shoulders of priests. It is called "boat-shrine of Meriamon-Ramesses in the house of Re", and evidently, in view of the epithet "in the boat-shrine in the house of Re" which follows the name Meriamon-Ramesses in the scenes quoted from the two side-chapels (p. 81 and 86), it must be supposed to contain a cultus-image of Ramses hidden from sight by the covering veil (cf. a scene from Wady es-Sabû in L., D., Ill, 180, a, depicting a similar "boat-shrine of Ramses"). We probably have an actual representation of one of these cultus-images in the figure that stands atern of the sacred barque in the sanctuary: north wall: scene I (Pl. LX and see p. 92-94). For the index of the deified Ramses' names see p. 120.
6. L., D., Ill, 239, c.
7. For this identification see Weigall, Antiquities of Lower Nubia, p. 116. Breasted (Records, IV, § 575) incorrectly identifies Miam with Derr and assumes that the statue was erected in Ramses II's temple there. It must have been enshrined in the temple, probably that of the local Horus, at Anibeh, of which there are still visible remains within the town walls.
All the reliefs in the temple are en creux, and, except for those on the walls and some of the pillars of the first hall, are very coarsely and clumsily executed. The depth of degradation is reached in the two side-chapels (see for example Pl. LV). In the case of the sculptures in the second hall and inner rooms, often only the mere outlines were cut in the stone, the rest being moulded in plaster and the final details added in paint. Time, bats, and the hand of man, have wrought terrible havoc. The Osirid statues (see p. 4) that adorned the innermost line of columns in the first hall, and the group of seated divinities in the sanctuary, have been hacked away. The wind-driven sand has eaten into and destroyed beyond recognition most of the battle-scenes on the north wall of the roofless first hall, and greatly injured those on the south wall as well, and it has, of course, stripped off all the painted plaster. The west wall, and the west ends of the north and south walls, have been largely quarried away. The second hall and inner rooms have been disgustingly disfigured and blackened by the accumulated filth of generations of bats, which have only recently been routed out; their return has been prevented by the erection of a wire door.

THE FIRST PILLARED HALL.

(Pls. II-XXVI)

This hall is from 14 to 15 metres long and about 12 metres wide, and at the north and south-east corners, where portions of the ceiling are preserved, the height is from 4 m. 80 cent. to 5 metres. The roof was supported on twelve slightly tapering pillars of square section, standing on shallow rectangular bases and arranged in three rows of four. The pillars in the first two (outer) rows (nos. 1-8), of which only the lower parts remain (see Pls. II and III), are 1 metre square just above the basis. Those in the third row (nos. 9-12) are slightly larger, being about 1 m. 20 cent. square at the same place, and are adorned on the west face with colossal Osirid statues of Ramses II, now cut away above the knees. The architraves of this inner line of pillars, which are intact, have been carved out of the living rock, and so also was the roof between them and the east wall, as the surviving parts shew.

The north and south walls, being excavated in the cliff, could only be sculptured on the inside. On the north wall there is a much damaged battle-piece and a scene shewing the king offering two rows of captives to Re-Harakhte, while on the south wall there is the representation of some incidents in one of Ramses II’s Nubian wars in a rather better state of preservation.

The entrance was in the west wall, but the doorway is completely destroyed, and the wall itself is, for the most part, almost level with the ground. The only portion of the wall that rises to any height is at the north end, and this bears on the inside traces of a chariot and horses. The outer face is so weathered and ruined that it is impossible to say whether it was decorated with reliefs or not.

The east wall, in the centre of which is the door that admits to the second pillared hall, is covered with representations of the king worshipping various divinities or sacrificing his prisoners before Re-Harakhhte and Amon-Re. Above these scenes is a frieze consisting of repetitions of the cartouche between two uraei (1), alternating with the name (See Champ., Notices, I. 89; L., D., III, 184, a; and cf. Pl. XXV, 2).

North of the door of the second hall, forming a dado, eight (2) of Ramses II's sons are depicted, marshalled in a line, and south of it is a corresponding company of nine daughters.

SCENE I (Pl. III; fig. 1).

Destroyed except for a figure of Amon-Re standing and wearing head-dress no. II.

SCENE II (Pl. V, 2; fig. 1).

Ramses offers two vases of wine to Atum who is seated.

Text. a. Behind Ramses: All protection and life behind him like Re!

b. Above Ramses: Lord of the Two Lands Usermare-Setepnere, lord of diadems.

(1) From each uraeus hangs a 2-symbol.

(2) There are now only six complete figures, one having been almost, and another entirely, destroyed.
c. In front of Ramses: Offerings to his father Atum.

d. Above Atum in four lines: Utterance by Atum lord of the Two Lands of On: 'I have given thee all might.'

Archaeological details:

Ramses. The upper part of the head-dress is destroyed. For what remains of the wig see fig. 2.

Robe no. 2 A with girdle-ends like 3 B.

Atum. Head-dress no. 3 A.

Robe no. 8 B.

The space between scenes I and III is occupied by the architrave of pillar 9 and by the following inscription indicated by II in fig. 1 (see also Pl. V).

Lord of the Two Lands Userkare-Setepnere, lord of diadems Ramses-Meriamon, beloved of Re-Harakhte the great god.

Scene IV (Pl. III; fig. 1).

Destroyed except for a few traces of figures which seem to represent officers conducting bands of captives, but there is much uncertainty. Above the easternmost group is a horizontal line of quite illegible inscription.

Scene V (Pl. IV; fig. 1).

Ramses in his chariot charges his foes who fly before him or lie prone beneath his prancing horses. This relief is unfortunately much damaged and the details are scarcely recognisable. It possibly commemorates one of Ramses' battles in Syria, corresponding to the similar scene on the south wall which depicts the king warring against the negroes(1).

Scene VI (Pl. IV; fig. 1).

A very mutilated representation of the king binding (?) four kneeling figures.

SCENE VII (Pl. V; fig. 1).

Published: Champ., Mon., XL, 1 (figure of god only and facing —— instead of ——): see Champ., Notices, I, 88 for text.

Ramses ——, his right hand extended in token thereof, presents prisoners of war, marshalled in two lines, to Re-Harakhte who is standing ——. The king holds his bow in his left hand and also the rope to which the captives are attached [3]. Some of these unfortunates have their arms tightly bound behind their backs so that the elbows meet. The arms of the first man in the lower row are tied above his head while his hands dangle in front of his face. It is impossible to determine to what race the prisoners belong as their features are very weather-worn and almost obliterated. They do not seem, however, to be negroes. Probably, as has already been suggested, since the battle-scene on the south wall commemorates Ramses' Nubian war, the north wall was reserved for the representation of his campaign in Syria [3].

b. In front of Ramses: —— !Image —— "Presentation of the captives whom his majesty brought from his victories..."

c. Above the prisoners in five lines: —— !Image —— "Saith the king of Upper and Lower Egypt Usermare-Setepnere in the presence of... Re-Harakhte: I have brought for thee the captivity of my strong arm."

Two of them are negroes, the third, who looks north, is an Asiatic with an aquiline nose and bushy beard, while the fourth, the central figure in the group, has a straight nose and wears a long spiral side-lock of hair. The clenched right fist of this fourth prisoner rests on his left thigh and his left arm is raised in supplication; over his right shoulder passes a band the lower end of which cannot be distinguished and was probably indicated in paint. It will be noted that only one arm of each of the other victims is shewn. Both negroes have a bracelet on their wrist.

This scene, forming the dado north of the door of the second hall, consists of a row of Ramses' sons. They were originally eight in number, but now only the inscriptions belonging to seven are left, and one figure has been almost, and another completely, destroyed. Each holds a -fan (see fig. 6), and his name and titles are written out in front of him.

(1) Champ. reads 𓋏𓋝𓋑. For 𓋏𓋝𓋑 here Breasted compares 𓋝𓋏𓋐 = approach = or sim. in Pgr., § 89, c, 637, c, and 798, b.
Beginning from the south the inscriptions are as follows:

Text. 1. In two lines:

«Champ., hut. — The hereditary prince, king's scribe, grand commander of the army, the king's eldest son of his body, whom he loves, Amenhirkhepeshef.»

2. In two lines:

«Champ., hut. — King's scribe, grand commander-in-chief of the army of his majesty, king's son of his body, whom he loves, Ramsessi-neter.»

3. In two lines:

«Champ., hut. — King's son of his body, whom he loves, chief champion of the army, master of the horse, chief charioteer of his majesty, Perahirunamef.»

4. In a single line:

«Champ., hut. — King's son of his body, whom he loves, Khamwese.»

5. In a single line:

«Champ., hut. — King's son of his body Menthirkhepeshef.»

6. In a single line:

«Champ., hut. — King's son of his body, whom he loves, Neb[nkhare].»

7. The inscription is destroyed. Only the top of the fan and part of the right elbow and leg of the accompanying figure are preserved.

Footnotes:

(1) is preserved in L., D., loc. cit.
(2) after — in L., D., loc. cit. is a mistake.
(3) is omitted by Champ. and Lepsius, neither of whom indicate any lacuna.
(4) is omitted in Champ., loc. cit., but not in L., D.
(5) Champ., loc. cit., wrongly has | | under Ç Ç as well as at the top of the second line.
(6) The — has been omitted by the sculptor.
(7) is preserved in Champ., and L., D., loc. cit.
(8) The figure which accompanied the inscription is destroyed.
(9) In Champ., loc. cit., — is preserved after —. The remaining signs Ç Ç Ç Ç appear as a restoration in Champ., but in L., D., Ç Ç and Ç Ç are shown as damaged while Ç Ç is intact.
8. SCENE II (Pls. XIII and XV and fig. 8).

Published: See ChAMP., Not. descr., I, 87.

A much destroyed representation of Ramses II offering prisoners of war to Amon-Re. All that remains of the king is the front of his skirt. Behind him are the legs and feet of some of the captives, and, immediately behind them, the legs of a lion and the hoofs and lower forelegs of a horse. In front of the king stands Amon-Re broken away above the waist.

Text. In front of Ramses in a single line:

"... captives which his majesty brought."

In front of Amon-Re in a vertical line:

"I have given thee strength for thy mighty arm like Re."

SCENE III (Pls. XIII-XIX; fig. 8).

Published: Ros., Mon. Stor., LXXVII, 1 (part only). ChAMP., Mon., XL, 1 (part only). For the text and description see ChAMP., Notices, I, 88.

This is a vivid, but unluckily much injured, representation of one of the battles in Ramses' Nubian war. In the western half of the scene — the part that has suffered most damage — there are two chariots, of the bindermost one of which only the wheels and parts of the horses are preserved. Beside the horses that draw this chariot is a man, destroyed above the waist, wearing apparently Egyptian clothes, and fighting on foot. Doubtless he is a hostile chieftain and is about to be smitten down by Ramses’ brandished falchion\(^1\). Underneath the feet of the king’s prancing steeds we can with difficulty discern the forms of the fallen or flying enemy. Immediately behind this chariot are the legs and feet of people advancing in an opposite direction \(--\). One leg and foot are much larger than the others and no doubt belong to a destroyed representation of Ramses\(^2\) engaging in a hand-to-hand combat.

In the foremost chariot we see Ramses with bow bent shooting at his foemen who fly pell-mell before him or lie prostrate beneath the hoofs of his careening stallions\(^3\). Behind him are two Egyptian soldiers — much damaged — each armed with a large shield and spear\(^4\). Many of the fallen enemy are pierced with arrows, one of them having a shaft implanted in his forehead. Hard by him a negro in full flight, but still clutching his bow, has just turned his head, to see whether his pursuer has gained on him. He, like most of the negroes in the scene, is clad in a leopard skin, the legs and tail dangling about his legs (see figs. 9 and 10). Immediately in front of him two men are carrying a wounded comrade\(^5\) on their shoulders who lies face downwards with his arms hanging limp and helpless. He is supported underneath by the arm of one of his bearers, while below him walks a boy. The wounded man is also accompanied by two warriors armed with bows, one of whom walks at his head and the other at his feet. The latter breaks the news of the defeat to a woman who wails and tears her hair. Under the feet of this man there is a figure with hand on head in the attitude of mourning, crouching in front of a domed hut\(^7\)\(^\text{\footnote{Or perhaps an oven?}}\).

\(^{1}\) Compare a similar battle relief of Seti I at Karnak. Breasted, History of Egypt, fig. 152.

\(^{2}\) Cf. the figure of Seti spearing a Libyan, in Breasted, History of Egypt, fig. 152 (group in lower register behind chariot).

\(^{3}\) It is this part of the scene that is reproduced in Rosellini, Mon. Storici, LXXVIII, 1. There are no breaks shown, but the drawing must be a restoration, for Champ. Notices, 1, 87, describes the scene as «très endommagé».

\(^{4}\) The shields are slung on their backs; cf. L., D., III., 324 k and 355. Like the rest of the scene in Rosellini, loc. cit., the soldiers are intact. According to this authority they also held an axe in their right hands, but whether this was the case it is now impossible to say.

\(^{5}\) The scene from this point to the east end is reproduced in Champ. Mon., XL., 1.
Behind the hut(?) is a woman, bending over a child, who has evidently run to her for protection: of the latter only the legs and feet are preserved.

At the east end of the wall we have the representation of a pastoral country. Flocks of goats and cattle with their young gambolling around them⁴, are to be seen grazing near a tree, in charge of a shepherd who leans upon a staff. Just opposite his face we can make out the figure of a small boy holding a bent stick and running forward. Behind the shepherd a negro clad in a leopard skin and armed with a bow, tells the tale of disaster to a wailing woman upon whose back is suspended a basket containing a baby (see fig. 14)⁵. The messenger is led into her presence by a naked child. The object behind the cow and skipping calf, with rounded top and an oval in the centre, may represent merely a small hillock, but, like the similarly shaped object already mentioned, it might be a domed hut or granary, or even an oven!

Under this pastoral scene and the group conveying the wounded man, is a row of prisoners moving ⬅️ and marshalled by three Egyptian officers, the foremost of whom carries a short staff. The hands of these poor wretches are bound either behind their backs or above their heads, or else crossed on the breast and tied at the wrists. The officers who wear a long side-lock of hair (fig. 12) are perhaps meant for sons of Ramses?

It is a great misfortune that such an interesting relief should be in so bad a state of preservation, due more to the ravages of time and the poor quality of the sandstone than to acts of vandalism. The style though somewhat rough is full of life and vigour. The wounded man and his bearers represented so unconventionally, the messenger with his bad news, the running children, the wailing woman, the shepherd leaning on his staff, and the sportive kids and calves, are motives not usually found in the ordinary run of Egyptian battle-scenes. For such naturalistic touches where the artist has given rein to his imagination, we might compare the humorous figure of the king of Aleppo who, after being rescued from drowning in the Orontes, into which he has been driven by the victorious onslaught of Ramses, is held

PILLARS 9-12\(^{(3)}\).

(Ph. XX. 9-XXVII).

As we have already seen (p. 4) the third row of pillars (nos. 9-12) and their architraves still remain intact. The west face of each pillar is adorned with a much destroyed Osirid statue of Ramses II, between two vertical lines of inscription, while on each of the north, east, and south faces there are two scenes (see fig. 13) depicting the king in the presence of a divinity.

The architraves on the west side are decorated with similar representations, which are, however, weathered away almost beyond recognition. On the east side, instead of the scenes, there is a dedicatory inscription of the usual character in a single unbroken line (fig. 13, a-b).

\[\text{Cf. \(\S\) of Tomb of Huy L., D., III. 115.}\]
The jambs and architrave of the door leading from the first into the second hall are almost entirely destroyed. The scraps still remaining on the west face (2) shew that they were decorated with scenes representing the king offering to, or adoring, divinities. There were no such decorations on the inner (east) face, for the scenes on the west wall of the second hall extend to the edge of the doorway. There are traces of figures however on the north and south thickness of the door, but too much destroyed to make anything of. This hall measures about 19 metres \( \times \) 13 metres. The height is from 4 m. 80 cent. to 5 metres.

The roof is supported on six slightly tapering pillars of square section (like those in the first hall), standing on square bases (Pl. XXVIII, 2). They are about 1 m. 40 cent. square at the base and 1 m. 20 cent. square at the top. The bases themselves are roughly 1 m. 80 cent. to 2 metres square and 0 m. 40 cent. in height. The roof was covered with stucco and painted. In the central aisle the decoration consists of vultures, with wings outspread, holding a ring and fan in the talons of each foot. The birds are separated from one another by the cartouches of Ramses II. Most of the stucco has fallen, and what remains is at the east end of the hall. The colouring, except for some traces of red, has disappeared and all details have been obscured and blackened by the bats. In the side aisles the ceiling has in many places collapsed, and no traces of the decoration remain.

Below the ceiling on all four walls there is a frieze, broken only by the architraves of the pillars and the door of the sanctuary. It consists of repetitions of the cartouche \( \text{cartouche} \) between uraei and the name \( \text{name} \) (Pl. XXV, 9).

This hall, the sanctuary, and the two side-chapels are entirely excavated in the rock. The workmanship is very inaccurate and there are no really straight lines or right-angles anywhere. There is quite a marked curve in the north line of pillars.

(2) Adequately shewn in L., D., III, 183, 6. Their present condition is exactly the same as when Lepsius' party visited the site.
which clearly shows in the photograph (Pl. XXVIII, 1). The sculpture in these four inner chambers is very poor. The subjects were only roughly cut in the stone and then finished off in stucco, though even so there are but few details, these having doubtless been added afterwards in paint. But the scenes have been so blackened by the bats that the colours have entirely disappeared, except for a few unimportant traces on some of the pillars. It was thus, as can well be imagined, practically impossible to note more than the mere outlines of the costumes and other accessories. The work however is so coarse that there probably never was much detail of archaeological interest. Owing to the dirty state of the sculptures and also to the natural darkness of these chambers, it was very difficult to obtain satisfactory photographs; moreover no light could enter except through the one door. All photographs, therefore, were taken by reflected light introduced by large plate-glass mirrors, of which as many as four were sometimes employed simultaneously.

held in the god's right hand. Behind Amon-Re, whose left hand is raised in blessing, stands Mut with her left arm round his neck, and holding $\mathcal{J}$ in her right hand. Behind Ramses are three gods, Thoth, Mont and Harsiese. The two last carry the emblem $\mathcal{J}$ in their right, and $\mathcal{U}$ in their left, hand. Thoth has his right hand raised in blessing and holds the $\mathcal{J}$ in his left (for a similar scene see L., D., III, 150, c; cf. also L., D., 53, 134, d, and MacIver, Buhene, Plate 20, 45).

In front of her crown : $\mathcal{J}$ Mistress of all gods.

(1) This scene here and L., D., III, 150, c seem to depict the granting of jubilees by the gods, the two others the actual coronation at their hands. In the former the king kneels upon $\mathcal{J}$ facing the presiding god, in the latter he kneels upon the god's dais with his back towards him.

(2) Champ. has $\mathcal{J}$!

THE SECOND PILLARED HALL: SOUTH WALL.

The utterance by Harsiese: 'Thou hast received the offices, O my beloved son Horus, in Thebes. There is given unto thee the office in order to approach the throne and the duration of Re which was upon earth, eternally. Thou art crowned as king for ever. The office of . . . . . lord of the Two Lands Usermare-Setepnere, given life.'

i. Behind Harsiese: ———— All protection and life behind him, like Re forever!

j. Immediately behind i: ———— The king, the lord of the Two Lands. Usermare-Setepnere, appears upon the throne of his father Re-Harakhte.

Rameses attended by a fan-bearer who stands behind him, offers incense and a libation in front of a boat-shrine which is carried on the shoulders of eight priests. In the midst of the priests, as in north wall: scene I, Rameses again appears, with the chief priest walking behind him and bending forward in a respectful attitude. Both of them wear a panther skin. Bringing up the rear of the procession is a priest with a flabella which he holds over the stern of the boat.

Text. a. In front of Rameses as high priest:  "Lord of diadems Ramses-Meriamon."

b. In front of the chief priest: "Lord of the Two Lands Usermare-Setepnere, . . . lord of diadems Meriamon-Ramses."

c. Above Rameses offering incense, in six? lines: "lord of the Two Lands Usermare-Setepnere. . . . lord of diadems Meriamon-Ramses."

Archeological details:

The priests and flabella-bearer. Their heads are shaven.

THE PILLARS.

(Pis. XLV-LIV).

As we have said on p. 41 the hall is divided into three aisles by two rows of pillars (see plan, Pl. I). Fig. 28 shows the way in which the pillars and architraves are decorated.

On all four sides of each pillar there is a frieze $b$, of the same design as that on the walls (Pl. XLVIII, 3 and cf. Pl. XXV, 3), and a scene $c$ depicting Ramses with a deity. Along both the north and south faces of the architraves of the northern row of pillars there is continuous line of inscription $a$. Only the north face of the architraves of the southern row is thus decorated; the southern face is blank.

The under-faces of the architraves between the pillars are also decorated with the names or attributes of Ramses II.

Owing to the narrow space between the pillars and the north and south walls it was impossible to make satisfactory photographs of the north faces of the northern row of pillars, or of the south faces of the southern row.

Scene I (Pls. LVII–LX; fig. 56).

Published: Champ., Mon., XL. 2 (the figure of the deified Ramses); see Champ., Notices, I, 94.

Ramses offers incense and a libation before a boat-shrine resting upon its pedestal. The poles by which it is carried and the sledge upon which it is dragged are all in place. Round about the stand are various tables on which are laid offerings and ceremonial vessels. Beyond the stern of the boat (Pl. He holds in his left hand a censer of the ordinary pattern, and in his right a libation-vase, from the spout of which the liquid flows in a broad stream, that divides off, however, into two narrow ones before it finally reaches the offering-stand upon which it is being poured.

The boat-shrine. The bows and stern terminate in the usual hawk's head and aegis (cf. fig. 24, p. 43). In the prow is the emblem behind which is a standing figure with outstretched arms, holding a vase between his hands, and wearing the head-dress and robe no. 2 A. Immediately in front of him is a kneeling figure wearing the crown and holding a vase (?) in both hands. On either side of the shrine, which is half covered with a veil, are two kneeling figures. In the stern is the steersman holding the rope attached to the two steering-paddles (cf. the similar boat-shrines in second hall: north wall: scene I, and south wall: scene II).

Beside the prow of the boat is a tall -flabella, and just aft of the shrine is a -shaped one of similar height. Behind the steering gear are three papyrus-plants the stalks of which touch the carrying-poles. Beyond the stern is another tall -flabella.

Between the offering-stand, upon which Ramses is pouring the libation, and the bows of the boat, is a table loaded with food, consisting of cakes of bread, baskets of fruit, -joints (?), a trussed duck, a bowl containing some kind of offering, and a bouquet of lotus-flowers (?) (see fig. 57). Immediately beneath the bows is a -shaped offering-slab upon a tall lath rack. Next to it is another -table, almost destroyed, on which are -shaped vases filled with ointment. East of the boat-stand is yet another -table, bearing four vases with lids in the shape of a hawk's head crowned with a disk (see fig. 58); next to it is a basket of fruit (?) on a similar rack to the one upon which the offering-slab is placed.

name Usermare (Wsr-m'-t-H'). The figure doubtless is a representation of the actual cultus-image of Ramses which was kept in the boat-shrine, and which is referred to in the inscriptions in this temple as "(see p. 2, foot-note 5). In front of him is a bunch of three lotus (?)-flowers with long stems, tied together by two \(\mathcal{Q}\)-shaped garlands. The stalks exactly resemble the regular lotus-column, and the treatment of the base of the stalks is identical in both cases. The vulture that flies above the god's head holds a \(\mathcal{Q}\)-ring in her talons to which \(\mathcal{Q}\) is attached.

In all these examples the deified living king wears ram's horns, as also at Abu Simbel (L., D., Ill, 91, h), where, however, his head-dress is surmounted with the solar disk, not \(\mathcal{Q}\). In the example before us the deified Ramses has the solar disk above his head but wears no ram's horns, as is also the case in some of the scenes in which he occurs at Abu Simbel (L., D., Ill, 188, a, 189, e); sometimes, too, there is no solar disk either, as at Gerf Husein (L., D., Ill, 178, c) and in all the other (undamaged) scenes at Derr in which the deified Ramses is figured.

In these cultus-statues of deified living kings seems to have been - the living statue upon earth - (L., D., Ill, 85, a, and cf. Breasted, Records, Ill, § 509).

This wall is completely occupied by four seated statues cut in the rock and representing Ptah, Amon-Re, king Ramses, and Re-Harakhte. Except for their thrones they have been almost entirely hacked away.

The inscriptions beside and above them — reading from north to south — are as follows:

a. Accompanying Ptah in two lines:

c. Immediately in front of b in two lines:

Offering incense and libation, wine, milk, everything good and pure, unto the king's ka.

[2] That Ramses should make offering to and adore his ka is by no means surprising in the light of certain passages in the Pyramid Texts, which have been fully discussed by Breasted in his recently published book, Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt, p. 59-55, and by Steindorff, in A.Z., 48, 152. These authorities have clearly shewn that the ka was par excellence a protecting genius (Schutzgottheit) who might be addressed in prayer as a god (Pyr. § 63). Thus in L., D., III, 34, b the figure of Thutmose III's ka, who embraces that king, is as large as that of the god Amon, with whom he is associated on terms of practical equality (see Steindorff's remarks on this scene in A.Z., 48, 158). There is a similarly large representation of Amenophis III's ka in L., D., 78, c, and of that of king Eye in L., D., III, 113, a. The divine rank of the ka is further illustrated by the formulae that often accompany him, such, for example, as \( \frac{\text{L.}}{\text{D.}} \frac{\text{I}}{\text{II}} \frac{\text{O}}{\text{O}} \frac{\text{O}}{\text{O}} \frac{\text{O}}{\text{O}} (\text{L.}, \text{D.}, \text{III}, 90, a). \)

The boat-shrine. The boat is quite usual and almost exactly like that in scene I: north wall. By the stern stand two tall fans, one \(\text{\textbullet}\)-and the other \(\text{\textbullet}\)-shaped. At the bows is a large \(\text{\textbullet}\)-flabella. Beyond the bows, but with the stalks resting on the carrying-poles, are three lotus flowers.

Next to this, under the bows, is a \(\text{\textbullet}\)-offering-slab on a \(\text{\textbullet}\)-stand.
On either side of the pedestal which supports the boat is a \(\text{\textbullet}\)-table. Upon the one on the west side are arranged four vases, shaped like canopic jars, with lids in the form of a hawk's head crowned with a disc (cf. fig. 58, p. 93). Upon the one on the east side are two \(\text{\textbullet}\)-vases containing ointment and four \(\text{\textbullet}\)-vases. According to the little sketch in Champ., Notices, 1, q4, the king is $\frac{1}{2}$; but as the photograph plainly shows he is not holding a staff. The $\frac{1}{2}$ is much longer than the usual napkin or handkerchief(1), and looks more like the ceremonial brush held by the lector during part of the funeral rites (see Newberry, Beni Hasan, I, XVII).

The architrave of the door is broken away (see fig. 61).

The Ceiling.

Down the whole central length of the ceiling there was a band of inscription of which only the eastern half is now preserved:

"All life, stability, and happiness! All health! All joy! Horus, strong bull, beloved of truth, protecting Egypt . . . . ."

(banquets); et passim. It is perhaps worth mentioning in this connection that it is a common custom among the modern Egyptian peasantry for the men, on gala days such as el-‘Id el-Kebir, to carry a handkerchief in their hand. This they do out of doors as well as in the mandara.

(1) — is purely decorative and extends right across the band of signs from edge to edge. It merely divides the ka-name of Ramses from the preceding formula.
